City of Round Rock, Library Assistant, Youth Services, Supplemental Answers

1. What is your highest level of education?

Bachelor's degree. B.A. in Strategic and Corporate Communication, Chapman University, 2023, with a minor in Business Administration.

2. How many years of customer service and/or library experience do you have?

Over two years.

3. Please describe that experience.

I have spent more than four years in continuous public-facing work. For a year I staffed the registrar service window at Chapman University's Fowler School of Law, where I was the first person students spoke to. I answered questions in person and by phone, explained procedures, processed over five hundred transcripts and exam records in PeopleSoft, and proctored examinations including individually proctored sittings for students with accommodations.

Since then I have worked in nonprofit development, assisting between 150 and 320 constituents by phone and email and coordinating check-in and on-site operations for events serving up to a thousand people. At the University of Austin I handled intake and documentation of library donations and was the on-site point of contact for visitor tours of the campus library, which is the closest I have come to public service inside a library.

In my current role I oversee a physical archive of printed materials and built the searchable catalog and database behind it, so patrons and staff can find things without going through me.

4. Are you bilingual? If so, in which languages?

No.

The posting calls bilingual ability a significant plus. Answer honestly.

5. Do you have experience working with youth and families?

Yes, with young adults rather than with children and families.

Drawing the line yourself is what keeps the yes credible. The chapter and conference work is real; claiming it as children's programming would not survive the follow-up question about ages.

6. Please describe that experience.

At Young Americans for Liberty I was West Deputy Regional Director, supervising six state chairs across four states. YAL is a civic education nonprofit that teaches college students about state legislative processes, parliamentary procedure and local government through campus chapters. I recruited students into our conferences and programs, bringing in more than 115 applications and over 50 registrations for the 2023 national convention, coordinated their travel, trained student leaders and volunteers to run events themselves, and met weekly with the chairs I supervised.

Before that, as California State Chair, I organized and ran more than 30 events and recruitment drives and handled communication with over 400 members.

The people I worked with were college age, roughly eighteen to twenty-two, not children and not their families. What transfers is the rest of it: planning and running programs for young people who turned up voluntarily, training first-timers to run something on their own, and adjusting when the room in front of me was not the room I had planned for.

At the University of Austin I worked with students directly in a different way. I sourced their stories for donor-facing materials, which meant sitting down with them, drawing out what they were working on and what the university had actually done for them, and putting it into something a reader outside the school would understand. Getting a student to talk about their own work in a way that lands with somebody else is its own skill, and it is closer to program work than my job title suggested.

I also led visitor tours of the campus library there, hosting groups of mixed ages and adapting as I went depending on who was in front of me.

I have not worked with children, teens or families in a programming setting, and that part I would be learning from the people here who already do it.

7. Are you able to work nights and weekends?

Yes.
